INFOSYS AUSTRALIA DONATES TO ASIAN TSUNAMI CRISIS

The staff at Infosys Australia have dug deep in response to the tsunami disaster by donating $33,765 to the Australian Red Cross for emergency relief. In response to this generosity, the amount has been matched by Infosys Australia bringing the company's total donation to $67,530.

Infosys Australia staff donated funds directly from their pay to assist the Red Cross. The money will go towards providing relief goods, water purification, first aid, food, clothing, as well as to implement long-term recovery and rehabilitation programs.

Gary Ebeyan, CEO of Infosys Australia, said the disaster had deeply impacted all staff, many of whom have friends and relatives in the region. "Like most around the world, we have watched in disbelief the devastation that has hit so many Asian countries. We send our donations and our prayers to those affected by the tsunami, and also to the many volunteers providing aid."

Dale Cleaver, from the Australian Red Cross, thanked all the staff at Infosys Australia for their generosity. "The scope of this massive humanitarian crisis is still unfolding and it is the support of organisations like Infosys Australia that makes a huge difference in providing emergency aid and long-term relief."

The donation from Infosys Australia comes in addition to the AUS$1.428 million being contributed by its parent company, Infosys Technologies, to the Indian Prime Minister's national relief fund.
